

Where Art and Literature Combine: Illuminated Manuscripts from the Eastern and Western Worlds

Spencer Art Reference Library: Library Guide

The Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art

March 2 –June 14, 2009

Before the advent of the printing press, books were created by hand by scribes and illustrated with painted images or decorative texts. In the Islamic world, these books were mainly texts of the Koran, but many literary and historical works were illustrated with miniature paintings that illuminate what life was like. In the West, throughout the Middle Ages books were created by hand in monastic scriptoriums. Manuscript painting in the Middle Ages was mainly for religious texts like the Bible. Other literary forms were also popular, such as the Book of Hours and the Bestiary.

The titles listed below are divided into two sections: 23 titles are currently on display in the Library's Reading Room, in conjunction with the exhibition From the Land of the Taj Mahal: Paintings for India's Mughal Emperors in the Chester Beatty Library. This group includes titles related to manuscript illumination in the Islamic and the Western worlds from the collection of the Spencer Art Reference Library. In the Further Reading section, we have included materials held by the Museum's Educator Resource Center, along with a short list of online resources, starting off with the Chester Beatty Library website.
